

Here is what the document clearly teaches about Value Events, and how they should be handled:

What Value Events Are

Value Events are the specific actions that move you toward your goals. They are the bridge between intention and behavior. The document calls this the most crucial step in the Mental Bank process, because it directly shapes what your subconscious is trained to reward.

They are initially chosen within three domains:

- Happiness
- Success
- Prosperity

You are instructed to:

- Pick one or two goals for each category
- Then define Value Events that support those goals

Planned List vs. Fluid Choice

The document clearly prioritizes intentional pre-selection, not spontaneous decision-making.

It states that choosing Value Events should be done deliberately and even suggests this is where a guide or coach can be most helpful. This implies:

- You create a defined list in advance.
- These become the actions you track and reinforce consistently.
- They can evolve over time, but are not meant to be randomly chosen at the end of the day.

How Fluidity Is Meant to Work

While the list is structured, it is not rigid or permanent. The system allows for:

- Adjustments as goals change
- Introduction or removal of events
- Rebalancing focus across categories

But the core idea remains:

You act → then record → not the other way around.

Clear takeaway for your mental bank app

Value Events should be:

- Pre-defined and consciously selected in alignment with your goals.
- Used as a consistent framework for daily action.
- Updated periodically, not created impulsively at nightly review.

The daily entry process is about tracking execution, not inventing meaning after the fact.
